Dan Shike, Professor in Beef Cow/Calf Nutrition and Management and Interim Head in the Department of Animal Science at the University of Illinois.

What is the ideal cow?

Professor Dan Shike earned his A.S. from Black Hawk College – East Campus and B.S. in Animal Sciences and Industry at Kansas State University. He received his M.S. and Ph.D. at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Dan's research focuses on identifying nutritional strategies and management practices that improve efficiency, reproduction and profitability in beef cow/calf production. Dan has authored over 80 peer-reviewed publications and given over 75 invited presentations.

This session will focus on how the type of beef cattle have evolved through selection and planned matings targeted at meeting consumer demands and maximising producer profitability. Over the past hundred years, cattle have increased in frame size and lean growth in the US, with more focus in the late 80's using performance records, sire evaluations and expected progeny differences (EPD) being utilised in conjunction with visual appraisal for selection and breeding decisions. In the 2000's, and 2010's, breed associations introduced bioeconomic indexes allowing multiple traits to be combined into a single value.

The information and tools available to cattle breeders has dramatically increased and so has the complexity of breeding programs. Ideal beef cattle type has evolved as selection decisions continue to focus on meeting consumer demands and maximising producer profitability.
